Dear Kate,

I am writing this email to you in order to express my opinion about something you said yesterday while we were talking with our friendgroup about social media. You specifically said that " Whoever has a good life does not frequently post on social media" a statement that i want to comment to you.

I don't agree totally with your statement. When I have a good time I don't want to use my phone in general because i think that i am busy with something that makes me happy. However I will take some photos to post afterwards and then, i continue to enjoy the moment. So I don't believe that people who post frequently haven't a good life. It depends on the person's character. Some of them enjoy posting on social media, like I do and others don't want to expose their personal lives, like you do. In both cases, people may have a good life.

To sum up, I believe that not posting frequently on social media does not mean that you have a good life or the opposite. It depends on your sociability and your preferences.

Hugs and kisses,

Aspasia

Dear John,

How are you?I am fine!We had a lot of time to communicate so I decided to send you this message.Last Monday,George, Maria and I were talking about social media and how much control it has on us.My friends tend to post their daily routine while I am not a fan of it.I am in favor of the opinion that whoever has a good life does not frequently post on these apps.Unfortunately,the majority of people uses social media in order to present themselves to others so that they can see how much fun they have.As a result,they forget to emphasize on themselves and on how they have the opportunity to make their life better.So,they lose the real point of life and tend to live in a virtual world with fake people.What about you?Do you agree with me or you think that posting on social media is something vulnerable.I am really excited to read your answer!See you!!!

My dear friend, i wanted to state my opinion concerning the fact that posting on social media is related to whether you have a blast or not during what you are doing. As far as i am concerned, there is no need for you to raise public awareness about how you spent your spare time while living your own personal life. In other words, the majority of people tend to publish every single detail of their entertainment in order to give the impression that they live their life on the edge. So as you can imagine, i definitely am in favour of your ideas and i strongly believe that today's society is fullfilled with undisciplined thinkers that only care about show casing what they do , behaving like glamour seekers.

Hi Joanna I wanted to tell you my opinion about the phrase "Whoever has a good life does not frequently post on social media". In nowadays everyone take a picture wherever they go and post it immediately. They don't mind to have fun with their favorite people. Their goal is to create a beautiful picture for their followers. On the other hand there are people who post pictures just because they like this situation, they have fun and feel more powerful and confident. To sum up if someone posts photos on social media that doesn't mean that he has boring life or no interest things to do, it is just a point of view and everyone should do whatever makes them happier

It is commonly said that whoever has a good life does not frequently post on social media. Even though that that isn't always correct, there is some true in the saying. When someone doesn't have fun in their own life they often try to pass by as fun guys. Many times they try to achieve that by overposting on social media. They create a fake life on socials, the life that they wish they had. They try to fulfill the void they have, but that in most cases doesn't work.
